He developed a cluster of sculptures for the city of Ostend called Rock Strangers. Strange objects that appear in locations where you would least expect them, such as the renovated Zeeheldenplein, the city's hotspot. They look as if they have washed ashore. Their bright orange color contrasts sharply with their natural surroundings and creates an unsettling effect. His Rock Strangers provide a colorful accent in an otherwise relatively neutral urban environment. With this immense metal installation, Quinze aims to counter the increasing uniformity in urban planning. He also wants to penetrate the safe cocoon that people build around themselves in the city.
